FYI. I thought you should know that HPBA again ran an advertisement in its newsletter, that includes an uncertified pellet stove, even after knowing that it is uncertified. The first time I saw it, I assumed it was just a mistake, and if they knew about it, they would not continue to run the ad. But I was wrong.

You confirmed a few weeks ago that the Comfortbilt model 50 was not certified. Has it been certified since then?

To me, its a bit alarming when HPBA itself continues to run an ad for an uncertified product. The ad is in a video link in the newsletter below, with screenshots attached.

Hope you all have a good weekend.

John

Dear Jack and Emily,

I hope we can all come together and agree that we don't support advertisements for uncertified products. A few weeks ago, I saw HPBA included an ad for Comfortbilt that included their uncertified Model 50. I emailed Emily, noting that it must have been a genuine mistake that HPBA would run a paid ad for that included an uncertified product. She urged me to report it to the EPA, but HPBA is also in violation of the NSPS by advertising the product. I replied that HPBA may want to also contact Comfortbilt so that they do not put you in that situation again. Well, it seems that HPBA is again running the ad, even after knowing that it has an uncertified product in it. (Attached are screen shots from this morning.) This is when we often put a spotlight on entities in social media or our newsletter, if they continue to run such ads. But I want HPBA and AGH to be seen as being on the same page when it comes to honoring things like this.

Of course, we have been in touch with Comfortbilt, and they seem comfortable keeping the product on the market and advertising it, through channels including HPBA. Rafael confirmed last week that it is not certified (unless it just got its certificate in the last week).

One of the main reasons we have tried to shine a light on uncertified products in the marketplace is because they undercut all the companies who are playing by the rules, who are usually the HPBA member companies. And it's often HPBA companies that contact us, to alert us of uncertified products on the market, as they would rather have us raise the issue than to do it themselves in any public way. This of course doesn't earn us a lot of friends, but we think we provide a valuable service to the wider community and we like to support companies that do play by the rules.

Could you provide a statement confirming that you will not run this ad again?

Thanks and hope you are all well.

John

8 tips for taking your holiday feast outdoors

Real Simple

The holidays will look a little different this year, but that doesn't mean they are any less special. And really, if this year has taught us anything, it's that we need to treasure time with family and friends more than ever — virtually or otherwise. While the CDC recommends only hosting an indoor celebration with the people that live in your household, taking your holiday feast outside offers a whole new world of possibilities and, yes, challenges.

Small-business loans will be forgiven, but don't ask how

The New York Times

When the federal government began the Paycheck Protection Program in April, one rule was clear to small-business owners bedeviled by its chaotic and messy start: If most of the loan money was used to pay employees, the debt would be forgiven. But as the program enters its loan forgiveness phase, those owners — and their lenders — are finding out that although the principle may have been simple, its execution is anything but.

Fall means fireplaces!

CapeCod.com

That old familiar chill is back in the air, and you're probably wondering when it will be time to turn that heat on, if you haven't already. If you have a fireplace in your home, however, you can hold off turning up the thermostat for just a little while longer. In fact, not having a fireplace will reflect on your energy bill in a big way. Heating your home can be expensive, but if you have a functioning and maintained fireplace and chimney, you'll notice you're paying significantly less on your energy bill.

The 6 hottest trends in outdoor fireplaces

San Antonio Express-News

Outdoor fireplaces long have brought the heat and light needed to make a deck or patio a warm, inviting place for family and friends to gather. In recent years, design aesthetics have moved away from the traditional brick or stone facade to a sleeker, more modern look. This trend has been prompted by the increasing popularity of natural gas as the fuel of choice, making possible options such as linear burner designs, colored lighting and remote controls.
